

Welfare Benefits and Labor Market Training

Fane Groes
University of Copenhagen

March 6, 2006

Abstract

This paper uses a reform in 1987, which increased welfare benefits of single parents by minimum of 12 percent, to examine the effect on voluntary participation in labor market training programs in Denmark. Using a difference-in-difference approach to analyze participation in training programs this paper shows that female welfare recipients choose a higher participation level in labor market training program when their maximum level of attainable benefits increase.